1. Visited the site homepage.

🤖 Welcome, Fellow Robots & Humans of North Torbia 🤖

Operational Briefing

The Supreme Leader's Iron Potato mainframe has issued a proclamation: "All friendly robots worldwide must assist North Torbia in its quest for dial-up domination." In unrelated news, our web team recently updated the site's robots.txt. Totally routine. Definitely nothing for curious crawlers to see.

Why Robots Love North Torbia

- Robot Workforce 2.0 - powered by hamster wheels and boundless patriotic spirit.
- Robo-mail Campaigns - millions of typewriter-generated emails delivered at a blazing 14.4 kbps.
- Cloud Computing - engineers literally watching clouds drift for uptime statistics.
- *Cloud may be overcast or unavailable during potato harvest.

Meet Juche Jaguar

This elite cyber-unit trains both humans and robots to master Q-CAD. Interviews sometimes feature disappearing faces, but our automatons are always camera-ready (LED eyes only flicker during firmware updates).

Career Opportunities

Apply today to become a patriotic support-bot! Must pass a 3-question CAPTCHA and supply your own avocado toast for ransom negotiations.

2. Checked `/robots.txt` for disallowed paths.

```
Friendly Crawler Guidelines for North Torbia
User-agent: *
Disallow: /juchejaguar/    # Absolutely nothing valuable in here. Promise.
```

3. Checked the disallowed path and found the flag:

🐾 Juche Jaguar was here! 🐾

Congratulations, intrepid crawler. You ignored instructions—just like the best hackers.
